

MAKE FREQUENT VISITS

During the last few days hundreds of students and citizens have visited Arbutus Hill in search of the arbutus, the flower which has been adopted as the flower of the University.

Arbutus Hill is the name of a section of the country about five miles east of Bloomington on the Nashville road. It is here that the arbutus grows in profusion. This flower is one of the rarest as well as one of the most beautiful that grows in the United States. Where it does grow it appears in large quantities but the number of places is comparatively small. In New England it is known as the Mayflower. It is one of the daintiest as well as shyest of flowers. It grows prostrate upon the ground and is often difficult to find. The leaves are a beautiful green and the flowers are white with here and there a tinge of pink. The perfume is sweet.

It would seem that the large number who annually go to Arbutus Hill would exhaust the supply, but there appears to be as large a quantity as ever. The arbutus appears shortly after the disappearance of snow, and is therefore one of the first flowers of the season.

There are two trips that Indiana University students make one or more times during their college careers. One is a trip to Brown county and the other is to Arbutus Hill. Brown county, with its hospitable people and its wealth of beautiful scenery and Arbutus Hill, with its rare flowers are places that are interesting to visit.
